would take charge of it. He would have asked some private member of Parliament to introduce the measure, without trespassing on Sir John's time, but that he felt constrained, in consequence of the importance of the subject, to move it himself.

Mr. Macgregor, M.P., said his own experience of the colonies fully corroborated the statement made by Mr. Stirling as regarded the want of labour. He sawed a right honest gentleman that manufactures were springing up in Saxony and Moravia, and that they absorbed a great portion of the wool formerly consumed in this country. From what he knew of the rights of man, he was quite certain that, without being trammelled by the bigotry and the prejudices of office, he would do what was right, and would lay the foundation of colonial prosperity by a direct and appropriate system of emigration during the period of the session quite content to leave the matter in the hands of the Government, because it believed that the question was better understood by the present than by any former Secretary of the Colonies.

Mr. Foster said there were two most important wants in the colony—one the proper protection of life and property, and the other the want of a supply of labour. It was said that the Government had sent out more emigrants than might be remedied by sending them from other ports, where numbers were readily to be obtained. He also suggested the propriety of sending out more emigrants, and of making arrangements in Edinburgh and Dundee to avoid the loss of time and expense of sending the emigrants to London. When he stated that every inhabitant of Australia consumed £10 worth of Highland manufactures annually, he thought that it would be well if the Government took the means to make an advance of public money to promote emigration.

Mr. H. Moore, of Melbourne, said, although there had recently been large supplies of emigrants going to the colonies, yet there was a class that was wanted—there were all adventurers and gold seekers. He did not think that soldiers could be called upon in the colonies to do the duty of police—they could be sent out to dig for gold, or to work the tin mines; and, as regarded the desertions taking place from the ships, it would, he thought, be advisable to have one or two ships of war, which the deserters might be confined, instead of having to send out troops, who would be quite willing to serve out their time, and then go off to the diggings.

Sir John Pakington expressed his satisfaction at receiving the valuable assistance and suggestions of the hon. member, but he could add very little to what had already been said—the deputation that had waited upon him shortly before previously. He could only repeat that the Government was aware of the extreme necessity of the present crisis in the Australian colonies—a crisis without precedent, and to which no past experience could afford any clue. It was satisfactory, under these circumstances, that the Government had anticipated many of the points now raised, and that the colony demanded troops, and they were about to send them; the number was, of course, a question of degree. He believed there were upwards of 600 men already engaged at Melbourne, and the Government intended to send 400, which would make a material addition to the military force, and, as a proof of his sense of the emergency, he had determined to change the command of the troops, so that they might arrive at their destination. It was a mistake to suppose that they would look to the troops to perform the duties of a police force. The Government required to support the Government and maintain the law, and he believed the Executive could be properly and efficiently discharged. It was intended that a man-of-war should be forthwith sent out and stationed there, and he had directed an inquiry to be made by the Admiralty as to whether naval officers of men-of-war in such cases. With regard to making this matter an imperial question, he begged to remind the deputation that their power to do so was a good deal impaired by the fact that the Government gave no aid to the Australian colonies. They must be managing their own affairs, and raising their own revenue, and he was met by the difficulty that he had no right to involve the funds of the colonies in the expenses of the colonies, without the consent of the local Executive. At the same time the Government was sincerely anxious to do all it could, and he had already given instructions to relax the rules with reference to the classes who were desirous of emigrating. Here again he was told that he must be cautious in spending the colonial money, or they might not like to have it spent upon different classes of emigrants. It was certainly going a little bit of their way to do this, but they were doing the best they could for the colonies, and believed the colonies would put the best and most favourable construction of it.

With regard to the laws of hiring and indentured servants, he believed that it was to be arranged by the colonial legislature, by passing local acts to adjust settlements between masters and servants. He admitted that the crisis was an extraordinary one; and in a recent case, in the Colony of Victoria, the Governor Van Diemen's Land, he remembered a statement that some men, who were absent eight days, three of which they had spent at Mount Alexander, returned with sums of money which were quite fabulous. It was said that they ought to raise immense sums for the purpose of emigration, but the fact was that money was not wanting; they had colonial money to the extent of £316,000, and the Government of New South Wales had written to check emigration, it would set both money and ships free; and he might say that there was nothing to prevent ships coming from other ports besides Sydney, and the conveyance of emigrants. The Emigration Commissioners had lately advertised for three ships, and they had only got two tenders, although the freights were now £18 or £19 in advance, and the Government was anxious for the emergency of the case, and he could assure them that the Government was anxious to do all in its power to assist the colony.

After some further brief conversation the deputation withdrew, expressing its acknowledgments to the right hon. gentleman for his courtesy and attention.

THE BOROUGH OF ST. ALBANS.
(From the Times.)

MR. BLADE expressed a very correct judgment, expressing, at the opening of the St. Albans Borough Election, his opinion as to the publication of the evidence would forestall the interest of the Report. In fact, it was past the power of barrister or commissioner to add anything to the native simplicity of the testimony received on each particular point, and he congratulated. The rarest talent for description must have failed when contrasted with the racy confessions of the original penitents. The commissioners were charged with the duty of stating the whole evidence, and he was glad to take place at the last election for St. Albans, and whether such a practice had been previously known in the borough. No sooner had they announced their errand, and promised abundance of evidence, while the witnesses were as much as was ever suspected was proved by ten times as much evidence as could ever have been dreamt of. Everybody in St. Albans's ways was bribed, and many expected to be bribed, and only by representing that the practice had lost its guiltiness through its very universality. If bribery meant the distribution of money for return for votes, there was no room for question in the matter, but money it was alleged had been distributed in this fashion for so long a period, among so large a class, and to such respectable persons, that the allegations of bribery could no longer apply. "So much was the payment a matter of course, that it was the custom for the agents of the respective candidates to take round a bag of money and go from house to house, and the village innkeepers, and many, and many respectable tradesmen have been known to take these guineas who would have been shocked at the imputation of having been bribed." Such proved to be the state of things in the borough, as was explained, as the Solicitor-General thought, no evidence—not a greatest suggestion" of any man's business-under these circumstances, the duty of the commissioners has been confined to operations of the most scrupulous and judicious tabulation.

Their report reads like a catalogue of a catalogue of market prices in respect of import or supplies. We are presented with aggregates and averages, sums total and sums subtotal, contrasted values and general balance, and the whole is summarily pendent upon elections at St. Albans from the year 1832 downwards is £37,000; and, inasmuch as since the Reform Act two-thirds of the whole expenditure is allotted to the purchase of seats, and the remaining third for such purposes previously, it follows that upwards of £24,600 has been thus invested in these commodities during the last 20 years.
In this interval there have occurred eight elections, so that the average yield of the borough franchise is correctly computed by the commissioners at £3000, or thereabouts.
"On one occasion," says the report, "three candidates walked into the room on the eve of election so late that they deposited £200 each, making £12,000, not one shilling of which did any of them get back." This "bank," we presume, was the establishment in which Mr.
Edwards was for some years "clerk and cashier," and the remark might suggest that matters must have been pretty considerable.
As to the particular individuals who were invisible to the Solicitor-General's eyes—there is to say, the habitual distributors and recipients of a head money, the commissioners are in the habit of saying, but they are not A, B, C, and D, respectively, according to a principle of classification on which we need not enlarge. One discovery, however, is made. The gentleman who is but fair to record, as testifying of the indefatigable character of their researches. "We ascertained," says the report, "that of the scot and lot voters, two never received bribes." The remainder of the remainder of the indicated, may well add the names of the of the electors in question—James Kine and James Webb.

Concerning the "state of parties" in this borough, the commissioners are not with a sketch, which Mr. Macaulay would be glad enough, we are sure, to imitate in relating the political intrigues of 1690. Unfortunately for the obligations of an historian it is not very constituency views opinions can be mapped out, and much more could be attainable at St. Albans. The borough contained three "parties," one of which, descending from the old "Spencer interest," resented its birth from Mr. Edwards; another descended from the old "Bell interest," and its money from Mr. Bagg; and a third stood by expressly to take care that money was forthcoming from somebody or other. If suspicions arose that the conservative and liberal parties were not getting on, and a member without opposition, then the beautiful and ingenious machinery of the borough was brought into play: the third party" stepped boldly on to the stage, and the election was over. It is of what they would unlock, and insured a contest by producing a candidate of their own.
The Whigs and Tories, in fact, were regarded as too much disposed to that decorous serenity of the old school, and the Whigs and Tories men. They "pronounced no opinion" on each other's politics, and the tendency of their philosophic impartiality was to obliterate distinctions, so that "no strict party discipline" was maintained. The Whigs and Tories by the door of a Whig, or Mr. Edwards waited on a Tory, the nature of the interview proved pretty much the same, and the toleration and forbearance displayed were exactly such as would be expected of a man who had no hostility would have been viewed with the noble Karl's own "indignation of sentiment, as such unpardonable "madness."

As to the particular facts about which Sir John Lubbock is so much perplexed, we shall be consulting, we are sure, the satisfaction of the hon. gentleman himself by giving the conclusions of the commissioners in due form. We find," says the report, "that at the election of 1868 £2500 was paid by Mr. Thomas Hydes Hills (this was Mr. Bell's commercial partner) on behalf of Mr. Bell.
Mr. H. Edwards; the greater part of this sum was expended by Mr. Edwards in bribery, and the remainder in the purchase of votes. It was that he advanced the money that it was to be so applied. We find that £2000 of this sum was advanced by way of loan to Mr.
Hills by Messrs. Brace and Co., who knew nothing of the matter. The £2500 was We find that the £2500, £2000 was transmitted by Mr. Hills to the office of Mr. Cop-pock by his direction and was thence forwarded to Mr. Edwards at St. Albans by Mr. Cop-pock. We find that the £2500 was paid by the latter that it was to be expended in bribery.
We find that Mr. Bell knew that money was being advanced in his behalf for the purpose of bribery, and we find that he owed his election to the money so advanced. We find that you, Sir Page? What do you think of the "evidence" now? Is any further "suggestion" wanted?

How Mr. Alderman Carden got clear of this point, Sir John Lubbock does not say; but of; but the commissioners do absolutely acquit him of any act or part in any bribery whatsoever, notwithstanding the seductive hints of his own purity committee and the unfortunate knowledge of the agent. There appears, indeed, but three parties to the whole narrative, those of the two "scot and lot," and that of the alderman; and unless, therefore, James Kine and James Webb, as the report says, "were the only persons who return Sir Robert to the office of hon. candidate," we do not see what could have been done with the borough but to disfranchise it. Still it always oppressive to serve as an example, and the present case is a very good one for disfranchisement, but it is not unreasonably that there would perhaps not acquiesce as complete disclosures if sub- jected to so close a scrutiny.
"Some of the principal inhabitants," says the report, including the clergy of all denominations, and the magistrates, "are all degrading a system;" but it is tolerably clear from the very last illustration of borough politics that these efforts have been vain. So St.
Albans is doomed; and though nobody can disfranchise it, the borough franchise is equity must remain open to question so long as similar culprits are permitted to escape a similar retribution.

THE SEPARATION OF GOLD FROM QUARTZ.
An interesting exhibition took place yesterday afternoon at a laboratory in Beaumont-street, Mill-end, of the process recently patented by Mr. Longmaid for treating quartz and other mineral substances, by which the whole of the which the whole of the valuable metal is obtained, while the expensive portion of the old system of pulverizing is avoided, and the washing and amalgamating operations are entirely dispensed with. The process is as follows:—The large particles of gold are precipitated by their density from the liquid acoria, but should any smaller particles remain, a ready means can be adopted for separating and making them available. The difference is that, whereas under the pulsifying, washing, and amalgamating plan, considerable expense has to be incurred, in addition to the loss of one-third of the gold, under the new plan the loss of the gold is measured, and the expenditure very much reduced.
The experiments made yesterday demonstrated this most clearly, and were very satisfactory, and the two large parties by the parties who witnessed them. Even the most prejudiced quartz can, it is stated, be brought into profitable working by this mode of fusion, which, if really, it will eventually brought into full and successful operation, and will be a great benefit to the supplies of gold both from Australia and California. A very fine specimen of Australian gold in the matrix, weighing 21lb. 5oz., the property of Mr. B. S. Lloyd, of Abchurch-lane, was shown, and was found to contain a large it resembled a small chess. This specimen was known as the great Australian nugget, was it will be recollected, sold in Sydney by public auction, and realised £1165.—Times, May 8.
